Map Out a Future in GIS

UC Davis Launches New MasterTrack™ Program on Coursera this Spring

Employers in both the public and private sectors are increasingly relying on spatial data analysis, data visualization and mapping to improve how they conduct business. In response to this demand, UC Davis Continuing and Professional Education is launching Spatial Data Analysis and Visualization, a graduate-level program that teaches the GIS skills professionals need to advance in this growing field.

Hosted online via the Coursera learning platform, this three-course program will focus on data analysis and visualization techniques that are vital to identifying business solutions. In course one, Spatial Data Analysis with ArcGIS Pro, students will learn how to use ArcGIS Pro to create spatial databases and analyze results. The next course, Introduction to Remote Sensing, will build on the lessons of the first class, teaching students how to work with remotely sensed data, such as hyperspectral imagery and LiDAR, and hone their skills using Image Analyst Tools and Raster Functions. Finally, in the last course, Cartography: Communicating with Maps, students will learn how to assess and manage data, identify audience and apply design principles in order to create quality cartographic products using ArcGIS Pro.

Through real-world projects, live class webinars and peer and instructor feedback, students will gain the skills and confidence to excel as spatial analysts and GIS professionals, all while earning credit that could count towards graduate-level study. Whether, you're looking to boost your portfolio and your résumé or take the first steps toward earning a graduate degree, the Spatial Data Analysis and Visualization MasterTrack™ Program may be the right choice for you.

The first course in the program, Spatial Data Analysis with ArcGIS, begins March 2, 2020. To learn more and enroll, visit coursera.org/mastertrack/spatial-data-analysis-visualization-ucdavis.

LEADING THROUGH COMMUNICATION

How one radio executive learned to lead through listening and collaboration

Paul Adams is a leader. He's also a lifelong learner who admits to relentless self-scrutiny. He's constantly asking himself, "How can I do better? What can I do differently to be more successful?" For Adams, the UC Davis Executive Leadership Program provided the space, context and learning he wanted, allowing for self-reflection and growth.

Adams, director of Corporate Support and Underwriting at Capital Public Radio in Sacramento, is a seasoned leader with an understanding of how important good leadership is to the health of an organization. And so, when he asked himself, "How can I do better?" the answer was clear.

Paul Adams

"I'm comfortable when it comes to leading my team," Adams said, "but I needed help communicating and collaborating with my peers. I felt I could benefit from training and insight on better communication with colleagues who are at my level because I often felt I wasn't expressing myself effectively."

For Adams, the most impactful seminars were Change Management, Leading as a Coach and Leading with Emotional Intelligence, but he said each of the eight seminars held immense value.

"The program as a whole really helped me learn to communicate more effectively with my peers and become a better collaborator," he said. "I think of myself as pretty self-aware, but this program helped me take a deeper look and realize that not everyone thinks the same way

I do. Every person in my class verbalized or displayed that there was a different way to behave or manage to get a more desirable outcome as a leader."

Adams valued the coaching he received in the program, as well. "My coach was wonderful. She didn't let up, and we navigated a few challenges. Now I have new awareness about how to be a better listener by talking less and allowing for interruptions."

Adams said he believes in collaboration, but he tends to offer more than he accepts. "I'm working on that," he said. "I made some promises to my team about how I was going to do that. I'm committed to being transparent, so I shared some of what I learned with my staff, and they appreciated it. It's a very different team now."

As the program progressed, Adams noticed other changes in himself. His patience increased and he found himself jumping to conclusions less frequently. "At my organization, there can be differing opinions about how we do what we do," Adams explained. "In the past, I would have questioned things I didn't agree with, but now I try to take a more tactical approach to problem solving. I just sit in the meetings and listen and wait. It's a priceless skill."

"Everybody can benefit from looking at themselves and the world around them. They can take a strategic approach to how they run their day, how they support their team, and how they're perceived in their organization."

The Executive Leadership Program is an eight-week series of seminars on topics geared toward the highest levels of leadership. Learning is augmented by 360° feedback and two coaching sessions. Learn more about the program and its benefits at cpe.ucdavis.edu/leadership.
